

IBOR TRANSITION

Helping you to prepare

Adam & Company

This is an important guidance note in respect of IBOR transition, providing information about how the transition might influence various IBOR based products.

Interbank Offered Rates (“IBORS”) are expected to be replaced by new risk-free rate (“RFRs”) across the global financial markets. Based on statements by the FCA, the expectation is that the London Interbank Offered Rate “LIBOR” will no longer be a credible lending rate after the end of 2021. Work is also underway for the replacement of other global IBORs. Adam & Company supports this transition, which may impact products you have purchased or may be considering purchasing from Adam & Company.

There is still considerable work being done across the industry to develop new RFRs. Given the complexity of changes to these critical benchmarks of the global financial system we want to share some information with you now about the anticipated transition.

It is likely that the process to replace IBORs will have an impact on both new and existing transactions.

Alternative Options

For LIBOR, the Bank of England’s Working Group on Sterling Risk-Free Reference Rates has recommended the “Sterling Overnight Index Average” (“SONIA”) as its preferred option. In the US the Alternative Reference Rate Committee has recommended the Secured Overnight Financing Rate (“SOFR”). The RFR working group for Euro has also announced its proposal on RFRs but transition work in the Euro is not as advanced as it is for Sterling and the US Dollar.

Whilst the market for alternative RFRs is still developing, there are many instances where references to existing IBOR rates may continue to be appropriate. For those products (either new or existing) we would hope to transition to the alternative RFRs by the end of 2021, or in some cases earlier. We will work with you on that transition. Given the current market developments in this area, we are unable to predict whether or not there may be costs involved in the transition process. We will seek to apply an approach consistent with market participants.

If you have different and linked IBOR products

In line with the general market consensus on this issue, we consider that it may also be prudent to include fallback provisions in our documentation should an IBOR cease to be published prior to the relevant transition being completed. This may take the form of a roadmap to determine a replacement rate or reference to a specific replacement rate. As the market develops in the alternative RFRs, it is possible that fallbacks could be triggered at different times and/or reference different rates across different product sets. Therefore, there is a risk that fallbacks may not apply in the same way across different or linked products which may result in additional costs to either party to the transaction.

What’s next?

We are working closely with our regulators, market participants, industry bodies and trade associations, to consider how the regulatory objective of eliminating reliance on IBORs to improve global financial stability can best be implemented.

We will continue to update you on developments throughout the transition process including how these market-wide changes are likely to affect your day-to-day relationship with Adam & Company and the products that you have purchased or, may be considering purchasing from Adam & Company.

We would advise you to seek independent advice on how the transition may affect you in respect of your particular arrangements.
